=====

In a data centric age, many challenges emerge surrounding securing information. Part of that challenge includes the very effort to conceptualize 'information' and its relation to established concepts such as just war, property, and self-defense, to name a few. Much of this effort depends on confronting normative paradigms related to communication, thinking, and knowledge.

This talk will address the following questions:

1. What is information? Why is an information-centric approach important to security?
2. What are ways that these challenges have been confronted?
3. What existing paradigms remain to be confronted?
